Communities Can Rise Above the Floodwaters, Together

Natural disasters, like Hurricane Harvey and the resulting devastating flooding in Houston are a time for community to pull together. When Colorado experienced catastrophic floods in 2013 the WildSage cohousing community escaped major damage, then they came together to go out in the larger city community to lend a hand with sandbagging, evacuating and cleaning up the aftermath. A newly forming group in Houston has been reporting the same type of community coming together to help

From Cohousing Houston, (a group that began forming in February 2017):

"Although we in Houston don't officially have cohousing yet, what we are experiencing during Hurricane Harvey & its aftermath is community coming together at its best. I know everyone has seen pictures, but driving down the street & seeing people's stuff splayed out in their yards, house after house, is surreal. Yesterday was the 1st day we had sunshine & everyone was out helping each other in mass."

A few of our stories:

-Members Tom & Kathy, we got lucky; sold our home 3 months ago & are renting in a high rise close to the Texas Medical Center (awaiting cohousing!). Brays Bayou swirled around us but we were safe & dry on the 20th floor.

-Members Kip & Lynn, Cohousing had several feet of water in their home. They immediately started the recovery process-tearing out dry walls, etc. We helped them Tuesday afternoon.

-Member Margie evacuated to member Debbie's house. Margie's house was spared but her daughter's house was flooded. We're on our way to tear out sheetrock over there.
- Friend Carol's house flooded. We spent the day dragging wet stuff out of her house. We ordered a moving van to move what's remaining into storage.

"Today is a beautiful, sunny day today in sharp contrast to the unceasing rains & floods of just a few days ago. Danger is not over as bayous & reservoirs crest & overflow. Recovery is beginning, there is a long road ahead, but there are lots of helping hands & so many stories.

The spirit of cohousing is alive & well in Houston, Texas!"

The last nails are being hammered in. Fresh paint still clings to the damp air. In Port Townsend, Washington, residents of the newly-built Quimper Village Senior Cohousing eagerly await moving into the neighborhood that they co-designed. The neighborhood that not only symbolizes their desire to take an active role in their aging scenario, but also their commitment to supporting, listening to, and living in community with each other.

Communities like Quimper Village are cropping up around the world as older adults are discovering the value of taking control of their lives. Socially, financially, and environmentally it makes sense to live near people who care about you, but until you can work with others to create this scenario, it is just a good idea and nothing else. Senior cohousing communities, and groups inspired by cohousing, grow from that need to move things forward into a collective of organized and forward-thinking activists. The result far exceeds expectations, in many cases.

Oakcreek Community Senior Cohousing in Stillwater, OK is a good example of a neighborhood where people spend more time on their front porch talking with their neighbors than in their private home. It happens naturally, because the group works together to design their community based on the values they create as a team.

What does it feel like to move into a cohousing home you've been building for years?

by Ann Lehman

7/31/17 On moving day. What does it feel like to move into a cohousing home you've been building for years? Exciting! The movers were friendly and right on time and carried all my boxes and furniture down three flights of stairs to the waiting truck. As the rental apartment I was leaving slowly emptied out, I had worried that I might feel sad to leave, but instead I was giddy with anticipation. When I arrived in my car at my new home, there was a small group of cohousing friends there to greet me with open arms, feed me snacks, hold the front doors open, and watch the movers unpacking my belongings! My movers pulled up and I was officially moving in. We learned that the elevator was on emergency power due to a partial power outage at our new building, but at least it was working, unlike the day before.

I climbed the three sets of stairs to my apartment and was happy to note it was very doable (the three sets of stairs)! Having lived in a second-floor walk-up with another flight up to my loft bedroom for the previous year had gotten me prepared for climbing the stairs. I walked into my new space—so clean and well-lighted by natural light. For over a year I had worried because no one else seemed to want the units in my "stack" with the same exact floor plan on the first and third floors, but once I moved in, I decided that I had one of the lightest apartments in the building—which had been my dream!
