While there is an abundance of information on our CohoUS website about the variety of Cohousing communities, as well as the option to post inquiries to the Cohousing-L list serve, nothing compares to spending time at a community. Whether you are forming a community and in the process of learning all that you can, or living in an established community and wanting to observe how others do things, this is time well spent. Coming up this month of April there are two fantastic opportunities to experience a variety of communities including attending a bus tour during the Colorado conference and just one week later a day of visiting communities on National Cohousing Open House Day.

Visit communities while you are traveling - use our CohoUS directory, click here

Consider this...while traveling someplace away from your hometown, when on a work trip or vacation, leaving a little time to visit any communities near your destination

Connect with your cohousing 'neighbors' - use our CohoUS directory, click here

And don't forget to connect with communities that might be right 'in your backyard'! Inquire about a special event that you might be invited to attend such as a house concert or a holiday potluck.

Enjoy these visits, meet fellow co-housers, make connections!

Fair Oaks EcoHousing: Intergenerational Cohousing near Sacramento!
Cultivating Resilience by Yana (Ma'ikwe) Ludwig

What does it mean for our communities to be resilient: economically, ecologically and socially? I've been playing in the domain of community for a couple decades now, and most of what I know about resilience was learned on the ground in the daily life of cooperative living. And guess what? The world needs what we know right now! Watch video here

Kids Shared Spaces by Karin Hoskin

Don't Let Your Kids Space Become an Afterthought!

Wild Sage had some cool things in our kids space, we took a small plain square room and built a loft, we added an old library ladder to access it, we painted each wall a different color and painted sparkly clouds on the ceiling...but is it really what our kids wanted? We're not so sure. It became the place where unwanted toys ended up...think about that for a moment...if kids kids play with them at home, why would they become suddenly interested in them at the common house? An Impulse To Connect by David Barrett.
I sit here on the Pacific Coast of Mexico watching the sea awaken in the soft pastels of the changing morning light of sunrise. The waves, stirred by a night of winds from the north rise and fall, then crash into transformative white foam, obscuring the boulders that define our boundary between land and sea. It is a continuous rhythm that defines the pulse of the experience of this place. Like a beating heart driving blood through our veins, or the breath that flows in and back, out of our lungs, this repetition reminds us that we, like this planet, are alive and in tune with each other at this most basic level. We are connected. We are, in fact, one. What a beautiful reminder that we are not alone. I breathe in micro droplets of her essence with each arriving fold. I remember that I came from, and am largely made of this infinite pool.

So what might this say about an interest in community? What do we yearn for as we go through our experience of living in a modern world? Is there an underlying call, an impulse to find connection? Where does it reside? How can we fill that void - or visit that place of belonging to something more? Read more here.

Let's get the new issue of Communities magazine out to the cohousing world! It includes articles from several cohousers. Communities Magazine is releasing the digital issue on a by-donation basis.

The issue looks unflinchingly at a major "elephant in the room"—the relative lack of racial and class diversity in most ICs, at least in North America—while suggesting ways of recognizing, understanding, and addressing it.

Authors share stories of obstacles they’ve encountered (from both sides of the privilege equation) and positive steps they and their groups have taken to move toward greater inclusivity and equity. They also reflect honestly on the deep-rootedness of unconscious racism, of social and cultural barriers, of problems of power, privilege, classism, "white fragility," and more.
